C. in 1895, I am inclined to attribute to the failure of automatic registration mentioned above. With these exceptions there is no large annual variation, and, in fact, nothing that might not be accidental owing to some of the causes explained. I have, however, gone further into the subject from three points of view. (1) Dividing each year into months. (2) Dividing each day into 3-hour groups. (3) Grouping the stars for every io of N.P.D. The first of these is done for B. and H., the others for B. only, as there seemed to be insufficient data for a complete discussion of all three. Probable Error 064, -054 050 050 -051 061 -670 As I anticipated in the early part of the paper the result should be persistently positive, it may be well to note the cases where it is negative, or so small as to be of doubtful sign. I find that a very large proportion of the observations included in B. February, B. April, and B. 6h were taken in 1893. It has occurred to me to reject 1893, but the evidence is insufficient as to whether on any occasion the registration of signals was or was not automatic. So I have allowed it to stand. The cases B. oh, B. 2th, and B. iii-i2i rest upon very few observations, and probably do not give a real mean value at all. There remains only B. 5i-6i,...
