Emile de Girardin, whose authority in such a matter we could not doubt, wrote, the 5th of October last, in the newspaper, I expected to see at Mettray the expensive loss of an ineffectual philanthropy. . . . What were my gratification and surprise. . . . to see the most perfect order and the strictest economy. . . and not to behold any where, I will not say any trace of luxury, or of any needless expense. . . as also I might convince myself of it in reading all the responsible works now before me 1. . . tors, to which they could make no objection, which had not been first anticipated. It would be a valid one, say they, if it only related to a simple establishment for labour, if we were only to teach them one industrial occupation. In a manufactory only one foreman, placed on a platform, can overlook fifty workmen employed in the same shop. But the morals are not taught as a trade; other precautions and cares are required as much to change the heart of a child as to exercise his fingers. Without mentioning the difficulty of the superintendence which farm and field labour involve, where the labourers are dispersed, to substitute good feelings in place of bad ones is a work which cannot be accomplished without numerous efforts, and the employment, if we may so term it, of an overseer for...
